What is Polonium-210?
Polonium-210 is a highly radioactive element that is extremely rare and difficult to produce. It is a member of the polonium group of elements and is named after the Polish physicist Marie Curie. It has a half-life of 138 days and emits alpha particles, which are highly ionizing and can cause severe damage to living tissue. It is used in industrial applications, such as in the production of heat for space heaters, and in the production of radioisotopes for medical and scientific research.
